OPTION: A

MASS TOURISM CAN KILL A CITY

1 We have all been a tourist at some point, but citizens of great cities like Venice or Barcelona are trying 2 to defend their traditional neighbourhoods from the massive invasion of tourists. The last local underwear
3 shop in Venice closed a decade ago. This means that residents of this city of islands have to go to the 4 mainland for such essential purchases. This is a warning sign. Any city that concentrates too much on 5 mass tourism will be abandoned by its people when they can no longer pay the cost of housing, food and 6 basic everyday necessities.

7 We're starting to see Venice without Venetians. It's also happening in Barcelona, a city of 2 million
8 inhabitants that received 7.5 million tourists last year. The local authorities say that they want to increase 9 this to 10 million visitors per year. These figures have led to open conflict this summer. There have been 10 neighbourhood assemblies and protests against the situation, because in popular places of the city the 11 scale of visitor numbers is affecting not only residents' quality of life, but their very ability to live in the area.

12 Neighbourhood communities are essential to the culture of southern Europe. Yet, people who live in 13 popular tourist areas are at risk of being forced out by speculators who raise the rents of apartments and 14 shops. The people who have always lived in these areas are forced to leave or, if they don't, they suffer 15 consequences such as noise and pollution levels that are difficult to combine with daily life. It's 16 paradoxical, but uncontrolled mass tourism ends up destroying the things that made a city attractive to 17 visitors in the first place: the unique atmosphere of the local culture.
